This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1789 edition. Excerpt: ... When they had proceeded with him near three miles, it was quite day light, they then judged it necessary to hasten their pace, fearful of meeting any one, and by now and then making the horse trot, it loosened the cord with which the officer's hands were tied; perceiving this, and after some little struggle, finding he could release his hands, he very prudently waited an opportunity till he came to some road he was acquainted with. After they had proceeded about half a mile further, very near the place they were to conduct him to, he discerned a bye path which led to the barracks, instantly disengaged his hands, seized the bridle and speaking to his horse, which had been an old quarter-racer, it set off full speed. These wretches all discharged their pieces at him, but owing to the thickness of the wood and their intoxication, he escaped, and arrived safe at the barracks. This matter was represented to the Governor of the province, by the General, at the same time describing the inhabitants, and their place of residence; the answer from the Governor was, that he was extremely concerned at it, but at present the civil power was of little use, the officers not daring to make use of their authority among these back-woods men, as it endangered their lives; and he had only to recommend the officer to be on his guard, and not quit the barracks, and that at night, for his personal safety, he had wrote to the Commanding Officer of the continental troops, to place a serjeant's guard at his house: yet, notwithstanding the wretches are acquainted with this circumstance, they have had the audacity to hover about the barracks, in order to seize him; but it having been intimated to them, that the American Commanding Officer had orders to apprehend...
