This futures study presents an analysis and discussion of a program used at the U.S. Army War College that supports and supplements the leadership course of the curriculum. The author describes the program as one that is designed to enable future executives to envision personal, organizational, and corporate strategic visions of near to long-range futures. Additionally, the author presents two executive tools that are useful for creating strategic visions. One tool helps potential leaders discover personal and organizational barriers and hindrances to creativity, visioning, and decision making. The other tool helps executives to create strategic visions by projecting their thoughts into the future within a theoretical framework called "The Cone of Plausibility." - Paul G. Cerjan (from Foreword)
